Some sites, such as `www.wiley.com`, offer DVDs that teach Photoshop, are useful free online guides, or offer free online courses. Some sites can be accessed through your e-mail program. They're great for folks who need to review the basics or take the next step in learning Photoshop. Photoshop lets you make great images and share them with the world. However, just as the program is still evolving, it also presents hazards, including security and data leaks. Be aware that your use of the program and your computer may put your files and/or your computer at risk. To create a great digital image, take advantage of your computer's capabilities. If you have the space and the time, and you like doing things yourself, create your own content, whether you're a beginner or a seasoned pro. If you're constantly frustrated with the state of affairs — or you just have the urge to blow it off — by all means, use a template or let the computer do the work for you. ## Caring for Your Computer Use common sense as you share your computer, because computers are fragile and breakable. Don't use your computer if you're feeling stressed; sometimes stress causes a certain ill temper. Stress and anger can play havoc on your computer and with you. When on the road, have your backup. Let others use your computer for as short a time as possible. If possible, use a public computer. And if you must use a private one, be careful in storing your files. Use only the file storage system that you created. Some file storage programs that connect to your computer can connect to the Internet to share files. But many times files are shared without the consent of the creator. Consequently, file security is an area of concern. Use common sense when it comes to accessing other programs or surfing the Internet through your computer. Use caution when accessing programs such as Java and Adobe Acrobat that have built-in security and the potential to damage your system. Double-check the software you use and the software that you download. It's not uncommon for some software programs to come with Trojan viruses. As for keeping all those bells and whistles to a minimum, right-click your icon and choose Properties. This gives you control over your personal data, including your default settings, color palette, and fonts. With that much control, go ahead and customize to your heart's content. ##

What's New In Photoshop CC 2018?

Q: Dynamic compilation of shader in javascript? I'm doing the following: `var template = document.getElementById('template-div'); var shader = document.getElementById('shader'); var html = " + 'precision mediump float;' + 'uniform vec2 resolution;' + 'uniform vec2 viewportSize;' + 'uniform vec2 outputSize;' + 'varying vec2 vUv;' + 'void main() {' + 'vec2 pos = vUv;' + 'vec2 uv = pos / resolution;' + 'uv.x += 0.25;' + 'vec2 res = vec2(outputSize.x, viewportSize.y) / resolution;' + 'res.x += 0.25;' + 'gl_FragColor = texture2D(...);' + '}'`; `template.innerHTML = html`; I want to do something like this: Create a shader (returned in `shader`) Get the HTML from the template Set the shader by id. Set the output size. Is this possible? A: In general I would expect this to be possible with something like the Method binding, but in the end, the only way you can pass in non-constant values to the fragment shader is by rendering to a texture. This is what the `varying vec2` and `texture2D` calls do. In your case, it seems like the only constant variable that matters is the output resolution. This is probably fine. You could do something like this: `... var shader = document.getElementById("shader-declaration"); shader.innerHTML = "precision mediump float; " +`
