Budweiser has announced a brand new Christmas Ale, and it's one that you can drink through the holidays, or go through the week after, without fear that your liver will implode on impact. Nope, it's no lager, and there's no bacon in it, but there's more than enough alcohol in the new beer to give drinkers a trifecta of indulgence. This comes as the beer brand is trying to take over the world with its first non-light ale, in addition to its first beer infused with a limited edition holiday ale, the 5th anniversary limited time offer of Night Capped. For those who wish to consume this year's copious amount of holiday cheer, there's only one way to do it, and that is the 12-pack – oh, and of course in the larger, 1000 mL version too. The new Budweiser X-Mas Ale will be available in the US starting November 1st, and all you need to know is that the alcohol content is a whopping 7.5 percent ABV. To give you an idea of what that means, the 8th or 9th of December will probably be a tough day for all Americans in terms of dealing with the effects of too much alcohol. And if you've never had a Budweiser before, that's a whole lot of booze in your system, you sweaty hippie. When it comes to Budweiser, the bigger the bottle, the better, as we've been told by the public and confirmed by the results of various marketing research projects. So if you're an

The present invention relates to the preparation of couplers from two or more oxazolidines in the presence of a metal chelate. More particularly, the present invention relates to the preparation of couplers from at least two oxazolidines with a metal chelate. The present invention also relates to the preparation of imaging members such as electrostatographic imaging members. Further, the present invention relates to the preparation of organic photoreceptors (OPR's) and toner particles using oxazolidines. In electrographic imaging, a latent electrostatic image is formed on a recording medium, such as a photoconductive drum. The image is then developed by a toner material which is thereafter transferred to a receiver, such as paper. The toner is fixed to the receiver with heat and/or pressure and any residual toner remaining on the photoconductive drum is removed by cleaning devices. In the cleaning process residual toner material remaining on the photoconductive drum after transfer is removed by a cleaning apparatus. Image formation and development, and the cleaning of the surface of the photoreceptor surface is accomplished by a magnetic brush. A two component developer material, which includes magnetic carrier particles and toner particles is transported to the surface of the photoreceptor by a magnetic core and a sleeve, rotating in the same sense as the surface of the photoreceptor. The magnetic core has magnets which hold the developer material adjacent the sleeve on the core while the sleeve rotates about the magnetic core. The toner particles in the developer material are triboelectrically attracted to the carrier particles and, when the particles are exposed to the latent electrostatic image on the surface of the photoreceptor, are attracted and held on the image by the electrostatic latent image. The magnetic brush rotates in contact with the surface of the photoreceptor while the magnetic cores rotate about the axis of the photoreceptor. The toner is subsequently transferred to a receiver, such as
