Nikki Haley warns Donald Trump not to mess with IRAN "Unfit" and "dangerous" are two words that the Republican presidential nominee has used to describe Iran. But on Monday, Nikki Haley, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, warned Iran and the Trump administration not to start a war. "This is not about diplomacy," Haley told reporters at an unrelated news conference. "This is about preventing Iran from ever getting a nuclear weapon. We're not going to let Iran have a nuclear weapon." "Those who would want war with the United States and the rest of the world are in no position to talk," Haley said. "And as the person in this administration who has been dealing with the situation, I just speak for myself when I say we would be cautious about starting a war with Iran." Trump tweeted on Sunday that the U.S. would "totally obliterate" Iran, suggesting that this is what he would do to Syria if President Bashar Assad were to use chemical weapons. Haley said that the U.S. would not follow through on this threat, though she did not rule out future military action against the Assad regime. "There are lots of things that are possible," she said. "I think that the military solution hasn't worked in the Middle East in recent years. We have to find a political solution." "That is one of the reasons why it is important for the international community to convene at the U.N.," she added. "We cannot have a solution that is only guaranteed to happen in the Middle East." Haley criticized Syrian President Bashar Assad for allegedly using chemical weapons on his own people, saying the world is "not pointer to an array of pointers? I have an array of pointers such as this: static int** myarray = new int*[3]; but I'm trying to set a pointer to it in this code: static int** myarray = new int*[3]; *myarray[0]=7; // compile time error *(myarray+0)=7; // compile time error myarray[0]=7; // compile time error What am I doing wrong? A:

You are accessing an uninitialized pointer and dereferencing it. myarray[0] = 7; Dereferencing an uninitialized pointer is undefined behavior, and the compiler will then produce an error. Also, *(myarray+0) is incorrect, you should do this instead: (*myarray)[0] = 7; You can use std::vector if you don't have to use custom allocators for the array. Here's an example implementation: int **myarray = new int*[3]; myarray[0] = new int[5]; myarray[1] = new int[3]; myarray[2] = new int[4]; std::vector v(myarray, myarray + 3); for (int *i = v.begin(); i != v.end(); ++i) { *i = 7; } int main() { return 0; } In search of the universal antioxidant defence system

The All Blacks have struggled with their ball retention in recent weeks, with major issues stemming from the scrum. It became evident after the Argentina encounter that the All Blacks lacked a cohesion around the scrum, which is starting to concern some senior players. Now, with the tests fast approaching, they are missing their leading exponent in the set piece. "When we talk about offloading we talk about scrums and the offload is an essential feature of any scrum," All Blacks Head Coach Steve Hansen said. "It's the ideal method of quickly breaking the line. "If we lack the ball in a scrum, we're very limited in our methods around the scrum so it's something that we're very conscious of, we're aware of and making changes to try and improve it." The All Blacks experienced similar problems in the 6-8 loss to Argentina, before their loss to Ireland the following week. They were much more successful in the results against Argentina, but still found it hard to keep the ball. Interestingly, the All Blacks were much better in the games against Japan and Ireland. As a result, they sit firmly in the top four of the world rankings. They have barely qualified for the quarter finals of recent tournaments, losing out to France in the 2007 World Cup, to England and Ireland in the 2009 and 2015 Rugby World Cups respectively.
