Q: Can a species develop two separate, distinct lines of communication and distinct physical characteristics without them being genetically separate? I want to create an alien world. I want there to be two species of animals living on the planet, but they are so separated in both the environment and physical behavior that one would think their species to be completely different. But in reality, the differences are so minor that they can communicate and understand each other. It's just not something any living creature on Earth would notice. I did lots of research in the past 2 days, and I think I found the perfect answer... Hens are different from roosters, but they are the same species. The Special Thing I researched this and have found out that there are two kinds of roosters, which are evolutionarily separated: Cocks vs. hens. The hens lay eggs, while the cocks peck for hens. But they both have the same DNA. So... Are there any differences in physicality between the two kinds, or is it just the way the two have evolved that is different between the two? What special qualities can both of these chicken species have that might make them different? For example, do they have different taste preferences or could they breed or develop two distinct groups of chickens, where one would prefer to lay eggs? The question I want to make an alien race that is completely different in appearance and behavior. Are there any species of animals that are genetically identical but which have evolved two unique lines of communication and genetics with two sets of physical characteristics? A: Don't worry about making the species look identical: they won't be. Humans do this, too, by having different hair and skin colors. Speaking of which, note that even within the same species, there are differences. There are various breeds of domesticated cats and dogs, which come in different colors. There are various breeds of dogs and cats as well, which vary in size and appearance. We do this to get different sizes of dogs, for example, to combat obesity and various medical conditions. This isn't the way to do it, but you can go further: Speciation Human beings are separated by technology, social organization, and of course species. An alien species that uses technology to control genetics could plausibly separate from humans without necessarily having completely different genes, but new species still require genes to share in order to be able to
