Now, after years of falling from its perch as the go-to snack, almonds are coming back, boosted by an uptick in sales of almond milk. But consumers may soon face a dilemma: Is almond milk really healthier than dairy milk? It's the latest food trend to bubble up from the so-called "clean eating" movement. Though experts agree that unsalted almonds are fairly low in cholesterol and have healthy fat, they differ on the protein content. Almond milk has two grams of protein per 8-ounce serving, according to the Almond Board of California, the marketing arm of California's almond growers. A gallon of dairy milk has one-and-a-half times more protein. Some consumers may be surprised to find that almond milk doesn't have the same taste. It's a bit gritty, like a salty granola bar. But it's worth getting used to: Almond milk is on the rise. It's already the third-largest protein-containing milk alternative in the supermarket. Sales of almond milk grew 19 percent last year to $66.4 million. That's up from just $39.8 million in 2013.
