Early and mid-life exposure to legumes alters anogenital distance and testosterone: later reproductive performance in male and female rats. Consumption of legume-rich diets by adult rats consistently decreases reproductive performance compared to animals fed a casein or soy isolate diet. However, the effect of legume consumption at the pre- and neonatal stages of life on later reproductive endpoints is not well documented. Female rats were fed either a purified casein (CAS), a protein-deficient casein (CP) or a legume-rich diet containing 50% casein (CBC) from conception to weaning. Subsequently, they were fed the same diet or a wheat-based casein-deficient diet (SWC) until adulthood. Male offspring were fed the same diets and studied as adults. CBC and SWC decreased anogenital distance (AGD) and restored testosterone levels in adulthood in both sexes. Whereas SWC decreased body weight gain during postnatal growth, CBC increased body weight gain and increased the gain in abdominal fat content in adulthood in male rats. CBC and SWC increased progesterone levels during pregnancy and modified embryo mortality of the CBC group. CBC increased the reproductive performance of the animals in adulthood. These modifications were observed in females, but these effects were not translated into an increase in the number of post-natal survivors. The effects of CBC on reproductive endpoints occurred in the absence of sex steroid alterations. Overall, results suggest that legumes altered hormonal profiles and sex steroids in adulthood, which may be associated with changes in the later reproductive performance. // Copyright 2015 The Chromium Authors.
