Memory cells are widely used in many different types of devices, such as dynamic random access memory (DRAM) devices. A DRAM device includes an array of memory cells that are typically arranged in rows and columns. The array of memory cells includes a plurality of memory cells, each of which can store one bit of data. A row decoder selects the memory cells in the memory cells along the selected row for access. A column decoder selects the memory cells in the memory cells along the selected column for output of data. The DRAM cells are usually formed by a storage capacitor and an access transistor. The access transistor is coupled between the storage capacitor and a bitline. The wordlines of the memory cells in a selected row are driven with a wordline signal and the bitlines of the memory cells are driven with a complementary bitline signal. During a read operation, the signal on the complementary bitline is sensed and amplified to determine the presence or absence of a logic state. The performance of DRAMs has been increasing at a pretty high rate the last years. As a consequence, the yield of DRAMs and the probability of defects in a DRAM, which causes failures during use or in the test of a DRAM, have also increased. Also, the test time of the DRAMs has increased, making the test process itself a factor that limits the yield. Therefore, there is a need to improve the test process and the test itself in order to increase the yield of DRAMs. The Parakletos paper-thin skin syndrome (PTPS), a severe recessive genetic disorder with an estimated prevalence of 1:75000 to 1:750000 cases, is characterized by a loss of subcutaneous adipose tissue and hyper-proliferation of the keratinocytes in the epidermis. Patients have bald heads, absence of subcutaneous adipose tissue, and hyperkeratosis due to rete pegs and cysts. The skin disease is often fatal within the first year of life, especially in patients with slow disease progression. The primary cause of PTPS is mutations in the RELN gene, which encodes reelin, a secreted extracellular matrix (ECM) protein that plays critical roles in the migration, dendritic arborization, and social behavior of
