A: You have to be as lenient with the licensing as you can because it's not easy to find out which licenses to accept and which ones to accept. It depends on how much you can trust the software, how much you can trust the company behind the software and some other things. As a rule of thumb: If you're going to use the free license version, you don't need to ask for the GPL-license. But if you're going to use the commercial license, you need to know that you're free to redistribute the whole software, meaning you can use it the way you want, but you have to release the source code to the public so that anybody can modify it how they want. You want to get the free license, because it's a good way to get to know the software for free and it doesn't have the hassle of having to pay the full commercial price for license. You want the commercial license, because it has much less restrictions than the free license, which allows you to install it however you want, but you cannot redistribute or give it to others. However, once you have made the decision which license you want to choose, it is best to go in depth and find out which licenses are compatible with each other. The easiest way is to go in depth to the Autodesk support. They're the best in that field, they
