»8:36 a.m. update: The front doors to the Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles have reopened after a bomb threat was made, according to CBS Los Angeles. The museum did not see any suspicious activity while the hallways were evacuated.

Shortly after 10:30 a.m. Tuesday, a call came in to the Los Angeles Police Department that a bomb threat was made at the museum. It's still unclear if the call was made by a person on the inside or by a person outside the museum. Authorities evacuated the building and started searching through it, according to CBS Los Angeles. As a precaution, visitors were not allowed inside the museum until 10:45 a.m. Officials did not say if the museum had evacuated or locked down any of the exhibits. Original story: The Los Angeles Police Department said Tuesday it was investigating a possible bomb threat at the Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles. Just after 10 a.m., the Los Angeles Police Department said in a tweet that it was investigating a possible bomb threat at the museum, located at 8021 Wilshire Blvd. No indication of a bomb, but it has been deemed unsafe to enter. Suspect still at large, evacuating museum now as a precautionary measure. — LAPD HQ (@LAPDHQ) April 9, 2016 The Los Angeles Police Department asked that anyone at the museum — regardless of 6d1f23a050
